Breach of Trust (With a Touch of Enchantment)

73 1 8

Chapter 1 by Tyler Funk

I never realized how easy it is to lose a friend, until one betrayed me, tied me up, and stabbed me in the back.

Literally.

I and my former friend used to run a small business that was, shall we say, held in high esteem by the certain groups of people. We didn't call ourselves criminals per say, but we did make a good amount of cash trading worthless pieces of junk to some of the upper class for fancier pieces of their unnecessary items. We were both self-trained Enchanters and we were able to transfigure the appearance of an object, like a rock, to look like something more valuable than a rock, like a diamond. While that's still a rock, you get the idea.

So to start this story of betrayal, it was a cool overcast morning and we were in the Down Ward by the docks. It was a damp, smelly place dominated by thieves and brutes: one of our homes. We had just finished up a hefty morning of business and were on our way to get some food and ale to celebrate. That was when the first domino of my friend's setup tipped gently over.

He was a double-bladed whirling dervish of a man, and he was the most skilled assassin in the land. Additionally, he had a secret past that he had never told anyone. He had once been a member of the Black Knights, a secret organization that had been disbanded by the king.

market and skills as a fence to sell our services to the highest bidder, and us, well, doing what we do.

That's all you need to know about Domino for now, but what you do need to know is that in this line of work we meet some "interesting" people. So me being betrayed by my best friend, didn't necessarily come as a surprise.
